

John Smyth (1570-1612) - The Rev. Dr. Peter Holmes

By the time John Smyth, who is widely regarded as the founder of the Baptist Church, was born, Luther, Zwingli and Calvin were all dead and John Knox was approaching the end of his life. John Smyth sensed a call to ministry and studied at Cambridge after which he was ordained into the Anglican priesthood in 1594. Smyth served in both Cambridge and Lincolnshire, but before long some of his contentious views landed him in prison. After that ordeal he abandoned the priesthood and for a short time took up the study of medicine. By 1606 Smyth had left the Church of England and formed a 'Separatist' congregation in Gainsborough.

Like the Puritans, the Separatists took exception to alleged abuses in the state church, but no longer believed in trying to purify the church from within. They came to believe the church is a creation of the Holy Spirit rather than a creation of the state and that the essence of belonging was birthed through a personal belief in Christ. Separatists also moved away from hierarchical leadership towards a more congregational form of church governance.

Though separatists would become very influential under Oliver Cromwell during the years of the Commonwealth, (1649-1660) and would eventually survive, they were heavily persecuted during the reign of King James I. Smyth's underground church in Gainsborough grew so rapidly that it could no longer function in secret and so in 1608 Thomas Helwys, a wealthy lawyer in the congregation, financed passage for members of the church, including Smyth and himself, to Holland. It was while in exile in Holland Smyth and Helwys came in contact with the Mennonites. Smyth, whose aim was to align the church with the model of the early church in the Book of Acts, responded positively to the Mennonite teaching on

Baptism as an expression of belief, obedience and testimony, rather than as an instrument of salvation to be imposed on infants.

Meno Symons, the founder of the Mennonites had been baptized as a believer in 1536, so Smyth was far from the first to reintroduce the idea of believer's baptism, but the Mennonites baptized by pouring as did Smyth initially. Smyth was the first to submit to believer's Baptism and then baptized the rest of his flock. Initially this was done by pouring, but it would not be long before his congregation was practicing Baptism by immersion. Helwys led most of the congregation back to England where they formed the first Baptist congregation in 1611. However, Smyth was never to return to England.

Smyth had other distinctive notions including the belief that everything offered in worship had to be of the Holy Spirit and therefore extemporaneous offerings were preferred over anything written by human hands. Smyth was very familiar with both the Book of Common Prayer of 1549, and with the early English translations of the Bible, but he was so suspicious of the works of human hands that their use was not permitted in worship. Instead Smyth preached from the Hebrew and Greek texts offering simultaneous translation in his sermons.

In other areas he was truly radical in his reforms. In terms of polity he gave authority to the congregation rather than the clergy and in terms of religious freedom he insisted that it be extended beyond separatists and non-conformists to include Muslims.

As a lawyer Helwys rejected the Mennonites teaching against oath taking as well as their pacifism. Both Smyth and Helwys struggled with elements of the early Mennonite Christology, but after Helwys left for England, Smyth grew ever closer to the Mennonites with whom he formally joined before the end of his life in 1612 at the age of forty-two. Though his life was short, his legacy as the founder of the first Baptist Church and as an early advocate of religious liberty, congregational autonomy, the freedom of conscience and Biblical authority was profound and significant.

The Rev. Dr. Peter Holmes is a Wycliffe Grad (W86) and Pastor at Yorkminster Park Baptist Church. Dr. Holmes is also a member of the Wycliffe College Board of Trustees.
